HISTORICAL NOTE: Up until the emergence of Scipio (c. 210 BCE), the Roman view of an overall commander was one who was expert on drilling the legions. Insight into strategy, operations and tactics not being part of the qualification specs, Roman consuls rarely had any. The best one can say of the many consuls who took the field during the years preceding Scipio (Africanus) was that several were "workmanlike" in their approach to the problems at hand. Rome's great strength lay in her political cohesiveness, her sense of discipline, and her manpower supply—not in her commanders. The ratings of the Roman OCs reflect this.
