DESIGN NOTE: The vaunted Roman flexibility—their" manipular tactics"—wherein one line could pass back and through the rear line, was not so much a result of the units' ability to pass through each other as to their unusual "checkerboard", quincunx deployment. There is not much benefit to stacking "front line" units that will be involved immediately in combat. However, if the rear lines are stacked and spaced it allows retreating and withdrawing units to move through them without any problems, while that stacked line then moves up, spreads out, and goes into battle (see the Manipular Line Extension Rule in 9.66). The "game" ability of these units to stack allows this deployment and maneuver. Those of you who have seen the movie Spartacus will be able to visualize this.