DESIGN NOTE: We have departed from conventional "wisdom" here and adopted the premise put forth by Peter Connolly concerning how many pila the Hastati and Principes used. Almost all sources state that the Hastati and Principes "carried" two pila— usually two different pila, one light, one heavy. However, the key word is "carried"; they do not say "used" or "fired". With this in mind, and following Connolly's argument, we did a little Delbruckian experimentation, and it is our (and PC's) opinion that the Hastati and Principes could not have held their scutum in one hand and thrown a pilum with the other while also holding onto a second pilum. Try it—it just doesn't work! It is more likely that the Hastati and Principes were simply carrying the second pilum as "ammunition"—either for themselves, later, or for the Velites, who could pick up these extra pila when they retired back through the Hastati line at the beginning of the battle (their pila supply having been exhausted.) The artistic depiction of a Hastati in "Great Battles of the Great Commanders" shows the larger pila attached directly to the scutum. Possible but it does look like it would retard mobility. Moreover, that larger pilum may have been more a spear than a javelin. Interesting question... no easy answers.